Travelling around the world is something that everybody dreams with since they are children but, would it be the same travelling abroad because of your job?

It is difficult to know. Firstly, I think that it would be amazing to be able to know other cultures and to learn other languages while you are travelling. That point is very important to me due to I consider myself a person who likes watching the world around. However, from my point of view, working and travelling at the same time might be stressful when you have family and friends that you want to see more often. What is more, you might not share all those moments abroad with them, so, I think, that would be a huge disadvantage for me and something that would make me change my stylelife.

In conclusión, it would be very funny and it would have very positive effects in my present life, but in the future, when I get older, I would change with no doubt!

Nowadays, Spain is a country where people is learning that animals have their own feelings and they are part of our lives, but are the laws good enough to control the justice and protect them?

On the one hand, today, more and more people consider their pets like a member of their families, and that is the big different with the people in the past, when they normally saw animals like a tool or an important part of a work, for example, in a farm. Furthermore, governments are introducing new laws to protect them and be sure they live like they deserve. On the other hand, in Spain and other countries (I suppose) we are still very far to forbid the lifestyle of many of them whose lives are very sad and they live in very bad conditions because of, for many people, the most important is not the animal but what they can do and earn with them. I think that things should change and politics must find a solution to guarantee that these important beings around us have dignified life with laws and hard punishments for those who do not take care of the animals.
